

All Disability Social Security Questions...We Have The Answers

What are my options if the SSA determines that I am not disabled anymore and is cutting off my Social Security benefits? All cases that pass through the Social Security Administration are reviewed periodically in order to determine if the member is still disabled. These review periods vary depending on the particular condition. If the member's condition is expected to improve, he or she will be up for review in 6 to 30 months. If there is a possibility that the condition will improve, the review will be undertaken after 3 years. If the condition is deemed permanent, a review will be done in 5 to 7 years.

The review will be conducted by the Disability Determination Services department of the Social Security Administration in order to find out if the member should go on receiving Social Security benefits. The member will go through an interview process and will be asked about his or her condition since being granted Social Security benefits. At this point, a medical examiner will determine whether or not the condition has improved. If the results show that the member can go back to work, the Social Security benefits will be discontinued.

If you disagree with the findings of this review process, an appeal may be filed with the office of the Social Security Administration. You may then be asked to attend a hearing, upon which time a reconsideration decision will be made. If the decision to discontinue your Social Security Benefits still stands, you may make an appeal in a federal district court or present your case before a judge of administrative law.

Can I receive any benefits for caring for my spouse who is disabled? While the SSA does not pay caregivers of disabled spouses directly, they may be able to receive benefits of their own. These benefits will be given every month and can be up to 50 percent of the disability benefits of your spouse. It is important to note however that the SSA imposes a limit to the amount of social security benefits that a family can receive.

The VA found me disabled. Will the SSA come to the same conclusion? Unfortunately, the SSA system does not gauge varying levels of disability, unlike the VA system. This means that while the VA system can find an applicant only partially disabled and therefore be eligible for benefits, the SSA may determine that no disability exists. Links Social security help ...

About the Author

To read more on social security disability lawyer, go to this web site.

Source: <http://ultimatedepot.com>