People think that anyone can find a discount when they shop. I know that sounds funny. But if you really think about it, you'll realize that there are serious skills involved. The entire field of consumer behavior exists because there are different styles of shopping that people use.

How do you tell a discount shopper from the regular consumer? There are several factors that people who are good shoppers will exhibit. One of the most important shopping traits is patience. Bad shoppers are impatient. There is certainly timing involved in finding a good bargain at a store. Because there are not sales all the time, you need to be at the store when a sale is actually happening. This requires some planning and research to figure out where the best deals are going to be. The dedicated discount shopper is good at doing this work ahead of time.

Good discount shoppers also know the places to find this great deal info. This is an entirely different skill. This skill involves doing detective work to find the best sources for information about the best deals. So they essentially have the detective skills and the discipline to follow through and go to the sale. In summary, a discount shopper is not someone who just happens on a sale and saves tons of money. If you feel you are not saving enough money when you shop, perhaps you need to examine both your ability to find the sources where deals are published as well as your discipline to only buy when sales are running.
